At 3 a.m., just as the night was on track, but Amelia knew that there were thick clouds and that she had to make a way-changing for the worse, so she chose to reduce altitude. A few hours later, Amelia logged her landing.

She was now the Balcombe Islands, about 800 miles into the flight. About a third of the distance between New Guinea and Howard Island. This was the last known location of the Japanese submarine I-58, which had sunk the passenger liner the Lusitania during World War I. It had been almost 40 miles off course.
